1. Location site: I would put up my stall at site C, which is close to retail centres. Large crowds of people are drawn to shopping centres, which means that potential consumers are constantly coming in throughout the day. Furthermore, roadside stalls thrive in retail districts since patrons are frequently searching for quick and easy food and drink options.
2. Target customers: People who work in the surrounding offices and shopping would be my main target market. When they go shopping, customers frequently require drinks, and office workers might be searching for a quick lunch or snack. These demographics are probably going to value a roadside stall's cost and convenience.
3. Product: I would sell a range of foods and beverages, such as sandwiches, snacks, cold drinks, and hot drinks. These goods are well-liked and satisfy a variety of palates, so they will be appealing to a wide range of my target market. Furthermore, providing a variety of options helps draw in returning consumers who might want to try other things.
4. Funding: I would use my own funds to start this business, and I might also apply for a bank loan for small businesses. The money would go towards paying for supplies and equipment purchases as well as the upfront expenditures of operating the business, like licences and permits.
5. Competitors: Other food vendors or establishments nearby, like food trucks, cafes, and restaurants, would be my direct rivals. These businesses present a problem in terms of competition because they serve similar client categories and provide comparable products.
6. Operation Time: The stall would be open from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m., Monday through Saturday. These times maximise the amount of prospective customer traffic because they align with peak working and shopping hours. Sunday closures also provide you a day of relaxation and guarantee that the stall is stocked and ready for the coming week.

7. Customer Attraction Strategies: I would use aggressive pricing, daily specials, and promotions like buy one, get one free offers to draw in clients. In order to promote repeat business, I would also concentrate on maintaining high-quality items and offering first-rate customer service. I would also raise awareness and draw in new business through local advertising and social media.
